TAMPA — Do not misbehave. That's the message to the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' defensive backs as they head into the offseason. In a different era, players would get fines for infractions, but under the new league-wide performance-enhancing drugs program, any violation of the rule book could have disastrous consequences for a player's future. The NFL is a family. The Buccaneers are family. And if you stray from the family's rules and are disciplined, it can come back to haunt you. That was the word from outside linebacker Mike Glennon to his defensive backs during an informal group chat at Buccaneers headquarters this week. Glennon's comments are similar to those he made to the media on Monday. "It's one of those things where you can really just think about it as the pros," Glennon said. "If you mess up at a job and you get fired and you're not with the family anymore, you can get penalized or whatever you want to call it, fired, whatever. And they're looking out for you as a family." In the NFL, it's a common refrain — players are all family, but when they step out of line, they're playing with a target on their backs. The new policy will hold players accountable for their actions. This year, one of those players is the Buccaneers' nickel back, Keith Tandy
