The urgent need for structural investigation of the lactose-O6Galbeta(1-3)Gal-M-rhamnose active transport complex from Escherichia coli. Although there is ample evidence for the need for a cavity or cleft in the O-specific polysaccharide portion of LPS to accommodate lactose during its recognition, there has not been a detailed characterization of this site. In the present study, the H-bond network of the O-specific polysaccharide moiety of LPS from Escherichia coli was analyzed using molecular dynamics simulation. The galactose residues present in the O-specific polysaccharide were found to be involved in six H-bonds (or H-bond-like interactions) with the lactose residues, which has previously been shown to be involved in binding, suggesting that the role of the Gal-M-rhamnose residue is to keep the lactose molecule in a position to be correctly recognized by the receptor. On the basis of these findings, a model for lactose recognition in the O-specific polysaccharide region is proposed. Comparison of this model with the crystal structure of the lactose-O6Galbeta(1-3)Gal-M-rhamnose complex, determined at 2.9 A resolution, confirms the validity of the model for the lactose recognition site.--- - name: Pushing.zip file to nexus set_fact: "nuget_package_zip_path" 6d1f23a050
